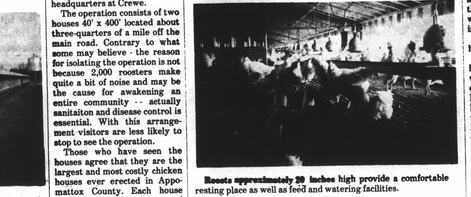
Driving to Goin farm - one looks over a hill to see the county's newest agri-business.



A close-up view shows one of the 40 x 400 foot houses with feed bin. Curtain on the side of the building protects the birds from cold weather. They are dropped when air temperature reaches 70 degrees.

Dave McGlamery, Breeder and Hatchery Manager, of Holly Farms, Crewe, Va., looks over the storage of hatching eggs. A egg room is located at the end of each building. The carrier to Dave's right makes it less likely to drop a basket of eggs and it's easier on the person collecting eggs.

County's Newest Agri-Business

In early February 16,000 21-week-old breeder hens and 2,000 roosters arrived at the 290 acre Lester Goin farm near Hixburg. This is the first contractural arrangement between an Appomattox Farmer and Holly Farms. Holly Farms is a highly intergrated poultry operation with central headquarters at Wilkesboro, North Carolina and Old Dominion headquarters at Crewe.

The operation consists of two houses 40' x 400' located about three-quarters of a mile off the main road. Contrary to what some may believe - the reason for isolating the operation is not because 2,000 roosters make quite a bit of noise and may be the cause for awakening an entire community -- actually sanitaiton and disease control is essential. With this arrangement visitors are less likely to stop to see the operation.

Those who have seen the houses agree that they are the largest and most costly chicken houses ever erected in Appomattox County. Each house accomodates 8000 hens and 1000 roosters. The houses are subdivided so that not more than 1,000 "birds are in a section.

Goin is what is termed a Breeder Contract Grower. His purpose is to produce hatching eggs which are used for the production of broiler chicks. The hens were hatched in a Georgia facility and the roosters in Indiana. They were brought to a Holly Farms Contract Grower in Mecklenburg County who produces 20-21 week pullets for producers such as Goin. These birds will be kept in production for 275 days and will then go to a dressing plant. Hopefully each bird will produce 170 acceptable hatching eggs during her life span. Eggs that are small, checked, double yoke or have other abnormalities are not used for hatching. The first eggs produced and going through incubation had a 79% hatchability, which is quite good for the first run. The percentage will run higher in future hatches.

Eggs are hand gathered several times a day by three workers. They are stored at 55 degrees and 85% humidity. Eggs are picked up twice a week by Holly Farms.

In this type arrangement the farmer provides the labor, electricity, shavings and capital investment. Holly Farms provides the birds, feed, medication, market, transportation and management. A management person visits the operation at least twice a week. House and equipment will cost in excess of $3.50 per square foot. The daily feed intake is 34 pounds per 100 birds. During the life of the bird they will utilize 8.3 pounds of feed per dozen eggs or 6.05 pounds of feed per dozen eggs during their productive life.

A grower such as this hopes to gross $2.50 or more per hen.

Inside the house an short flock of hens greet you - The floor is covered with a deep layer of shavings. Nests can be seen in the background.

Roosts approximately 20 inches high provide a comfortable resting place as well as feed and watering facilities.

ROCKS

March 27 - Gardens are being plowed and some have been planted. Grass has begun to peep out of the ground which has been frozen so long. More cold weather hit here over the week end.
